

Personal Note from the Author Of The Relative Framework

I never planned to write philosophy. In truth, I spent most of my life outside anything you would call a formal education. What I had was not schooling; it was something quieter: years of watching, listening, and trying to make sense of what I saw.

The one ability that carried me through all of it was not memory, in fact, that has never been my strength. What made this work possible was pattern recognition. I noticed how things connect, how people repeat, and how meaning emerges not from certainty, but from the structures we move through.

Over time, that way of seeing became a perspective. That perspective became a framework. And the digital revolution gave me access to voices, ideas, and questions I never would have encountered otherwise. I absorbed what I could, from the world, and from the space between people trying to understand it.

What you are reading now is not meant to be an answer to everything. It is simply my way of putting the pieces together. I offer it because it is real to me, and perhaps, for someone else out there, it might offer something useful too.
